3. Had dinner with personnel of the 25X1A6a [redacted] during which we discussed main office and local office relations. One item which they mentioned and which I later passed on to [redacted] was the desirability of sending even out-of-date ultimate intelligence publications to the local offices, so that they could see the form in which their material was transmitted to consumers. I suggested to [redacted] that we would not want to build up intelligence files in the local offices, but that there were enough visitors from the main office who might carry a paper or two with them. A specific request was made for the publication going to the President. There were obvious difficulties about this, but I felt that appropriate examples of the briefings currently being prepared for the Presidential candidates might be an adequate substitute.
